President Vladimir Putin has ordered Russian military to deploy a new anti-ballistic missile system to the central part of the country and carry out a test drill with nuclear cruise missiles. Putin described the system as a "breakthrough" technology. In a presidential decree signed on Monday, the Russian leader gave the order to test the system at the Doyma military drill ground in the Lipetsk region, northeast of Moscow. The decree stated the tests will be carried out in October. The Russian leader also gave the order to start construction of a new nuclear-powered cruise missile vehicle to carry the cruise missile at the Ulubuy military trial area in the Chelyabinsk region, south of the Ural Mountains. The system will be equipped with a new type of weapon capable of delivering multiple nuclear warheads. Moscovite has increased its control over the federal budget in exchange for a slice of the oil revenue. The distribution of oil revenue, which has traditionally been a bone of contention between the Kremlin and Moscow, is an important issue.

The Russian economy appears to have weathered the sanctions and allies from around the world have been quick to condemn the US move. But some analysts believe the sanctions and political pressure are likely to hit Moscow's economy in the long run.

The US measures come as part of a wider campaign of economic sanctions aimed at isolating Russia. The US has imposed a series of sanctions on Russia over its alleged interference in the US presidential election in 2016 and its annexation of Crimea.
